“ Wine sales're stuck in the muck and sinkin' deeper. It's the fuckin' wretched names, I tell ye. Folk outwith the duchy havenae any notion how tae say Cote de Blessure and all that. It twists their tongues in bloody knots. Makes 'em ashamed to ask for it. ”

- Banker Giacomo Cianfanelli musing on why 1275 sales were weaker, Blood and Wine expansion

Côte-de-Blessure is an expensive red wine produced by Pomerol vineyard in Blessure valley of Toussaint.<sup>[1]</sup> Renowned and prestigious, this red wine is so esteemed it graces royal feasts<sup>[2]</sup> and commands a significant sum per bottle. In the eyes of Reynart de Bois-Fresnes, Côte-de-Blessure is the best choice to pair with beef.<sup>[1]</sup> Its structure complements dishes as intricate as Étoile Blanche Pasta with marinated turkey and chantarelles, showing the ability of the Pomerol red wine to come together in harmony with them.<sup>[3]</sup>

On their first encounter in Villa Cyclamen, the enchantress Lytta Neyd offered Geralt of Rivia Côte-de-Blessure as a worthy alternative to two white wines from Toussaint, the celebrated Est Est and her personal preference, Nuragus.<sup>[4]</sup> Discussing wines with one of Duchess Anna Henrietta's tasters, her Minister Victor Tremblay admitted that he considered Côte-de-Blessure tastier than even Sangreal, the red wine aged in cellars of Castel Ravello reserved for the ducal house and its inner circle.<sup>[2]</sup>
